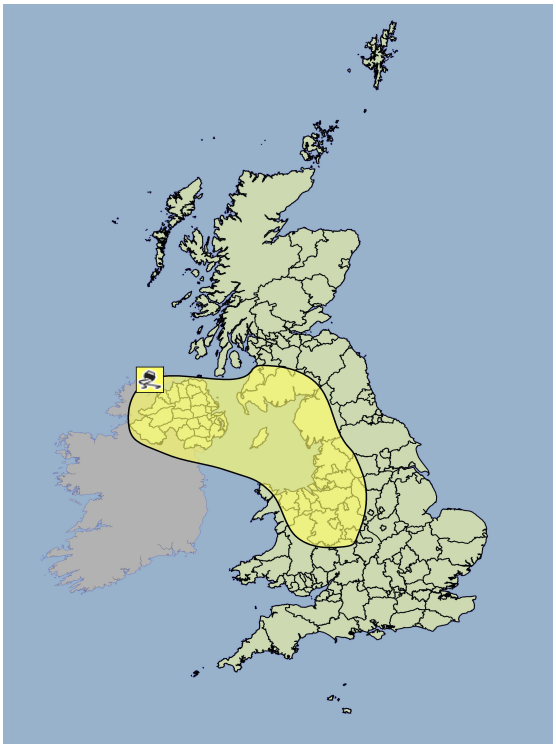
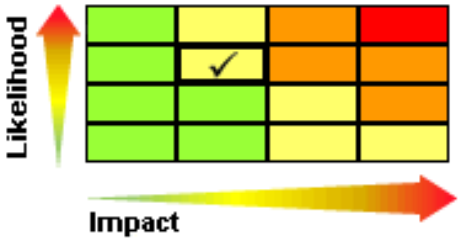
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
An active occluded front will bring a band of rain, some heavy, eastwards across the UK during Sunday, becoming slow moving close to North Sea coasts and possibly lingering across central, northern and eastern Scotland during Monday. There is uncertainty in the extent of the cloud and rain clearance from eastern areas and thus the temperatures towards dawn on Monday, but further west clearing skies will allow road temperatures to fall below zero, with ice forming on untreated surfaces left wet by the earlier rain.

Heavy showers, wintry in places, will follow into southwestern parts of the UK early on Monday.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Ice

Valid from 20:00 on Sun, 02nd Mar 2014 until 09:00 on Mon, 03rd Mar 2014

A band of rain will move east across the UK during Sunday, followed by clearing skies and light winds across many central areas leading to frost and ice with the risk of patchy freezing fog.

The public should be aware of the risk of ice forming on untreated surfaces, firstly across Northern Ireland during Sunday evening and then overnight over southwest Scotland, parts of Wales, northern England and the Midlands.
